I know this question has been asked before, but no answer really explains why. When I use the IsDependencyObject method, it returns True for a window. But why? It seems to me that the window object is already a dependency object. What am I missing? A: The idea behind IsDependencyObject is to identify objects that are directly related to the visual and visual-related elements of the window and its children. For example, it may identify a Button and a TextBox (even if the TextBox is a child of a different UIElement). It also identifies an ElementHost, which represents the host element of a WebBrowser control. There are no guarantee that the window itself will be a dependency object. The window could represent a proxy for a control that is actually located elsewhere. For example, say that you have a Page class that represents the content for a page. You could have a Page object representing the content of a page, but with an ElementHost. This would mean that the Page object would be a dependency object, even though the ElementHost object actually represents the content of the page. Thus, IsDependencyObject always returns true when a VisualObject is involved in the rendering of a control's visual tree. Women's History Month 2019 : L'Uomo Contemporaneo 2018 Vincenzio Maria Giusti [SOLO] Women in the Fine Arts «It seems odd, don't you think, that women have been represented in the fine arts – as models or as nude women, as decorators or frescoists – since the first days of the Renaissance…" So begins the Italian intellectual and artist Vincenzio Maria Giusti in his 1832 essay on the role of women in the fine arts. «It is evident that when the male artists had to choose among their models the most beautiful, and to idealize the beauty of their paintings they had to reflect the image of the woman they most admired, whoever she might be. This is why they often chose the most beautiful women they could
